

Study: Education by radiologists may decrease breast cancer screening anxiety

When radiologists educated laypeople about breast cancer screening through public lectures, attendees were less anxious about screening procedures and indicated better understanding of screening, according to a study in a radiology journal. Presentation attendees also said getting immediate results and consulting with a radiologist would decrease their anxiety