

Study: Recurring Breast Cancer Detected By MRI, Missed By Other Modalities.

HealthImaging (8/22, Beachy) reports a study published in Radiology suggests that recurring breast cancer missed by ultrasound and mammography can be detected by single-screening MRI. The study's authors suggested that "it may be appropriate to recommend screening MRI imaging in women (younger than 50) with a personal history of breast cancer."